AND UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS,
AMICI CURIAE

of the parties.

Statement of the Case

The statute under attack is Act 92 of the Laws of Pennsylvania, 1971, known as the Parent Reimbursement Act for Nonpublic Education, 24 P.S. §5701, et seq. (referred to herein as "the Act"). Section 2 of the Act recites as a "Legislative Finding" and "Declaration of Policy" that parents who send their children to nonpublic schools assist the State in reducing the rising costs of public education but that the "impact of inflation, plus sharply rising costs of education, now combine to place in jeopardy the ability of such parents fully to carry this burden." Should nonpublic school parents be forced by economic circumstances to transfer their children in substantial number to nonpublic schools, it is said, an enormous burden would be placed upon the public schools and upon the taxpayers of the state. Section 2 then estimates the economic consequences of such transfers and concludes that such costs would "be an intolerable public burden and present standards of public education would be seriously jeopardized." Therefore, "to reimburse parents partially for this service so vitally needed by the Commonwealth, and in order to foster educational opportunity for all children," the Act establishes a Parent Reimbursement Fund. The Fund is to be administered by the Pennsylvania Parent Assistance Authority consisting of five members appointed by the Governor.

Under the provisions of the Act, beginning July 1, 1971, 23% of the revenues collected under the Pennsylvania Cigarette Tax Act are to be paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the Parent Reimbursement Fund. Sums in the Reimbursement Fund are to be distributed to the parents of any child attending a nonpublic school within the state which fulfills the compulsory school attendance law and which meets the requirements of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Public Law 88-352). Upon the filing of a verified statement by the parent at the end of the school year, a payment of $75 for each elementary school child and $150 for each secondary school child is to be made by the Authority not later than September 15 of the following school year. In the event the tuition paid or contracted to be paid is less than $75 or $150, the lesser sum is to be repaid.

Appellees, who are citizens, residents and taxpayers in Pennsylvania purchasing cigarettes in the state (one being also the parent of a Negro child attending public school), challenged the Act in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Appellees' complaint, filed on September 13, 1971, contended that the Act on its face and as applied is a law respecting the establishment of religion in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States in that it finances religious instruction and worship; has as its purpose the advancement of religion; has as its primary effect the advancement of religion; gives rise to and intensifies political fragmentation and divisiveness on religious lines, and prefers those religions and sects which operate a parochial school system.

The complaint also alleged with respect to the First and Fourteenth Amendments that the Act on its face and as construed would prohibit the free exercise of religion in that it constitutes compulsory taxation for the support of religion and discriminates against and weakens those religions which do not choose to operate, or cannot afford to operate, a parochial system of education.

Finally, the complaint alleged that the Act violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution by perpetuating and promoting the segregation of the races.

The complaint sought the convening of a three-judge court to declare the Act unconstitutional and enjoin its enforcement and a preliminary injunction pending trial of the issues.

In November 1971, the appellant State Treasurer moved to dismiss, arguing that the Act was constitutional and that the complaint failed to show the Establishment Clause and Free Exercise claims ripe for decision. The appellant also denied that the Act resulted in discriminatory state action or invidious classification and asserted that insufficient facts were alleged to show such a claim ripe for decision. Finally, the appellant challenged appellees' standing to sue.

A three-judge court was impanelled. Parents of non-public school students were permitted to intervene on the ground that their claims and defenses were distinct from those of the State Treasurer.

On April 6, 1972, the three-judge court unanimously denied the motion to dismiss. In its opinion the court concluded that the Act violated the Establishment Clause because it unconstitutionally aided sectarian schools and supported religion by aiding parents in providing their children with a religious education. Having ruled that the Establishment Clause precluded state reimbursement of sums paid as tuition to schools providing religious education, the court did not consider the Free Exercise and Equal Protection claims of the complaint or arguments relating to standing.

On May 2, 1972, appellant and parent-intervenors filed answers to the appellees' complaint. Appellees then moved for summary judgment which was granted by the three-judge court on July 21, 1972 in accordance with its opinion of April 6.

Interest of the Amici

This brief is submitted in behalf of the following national Jewish organizations:

American Jewish Committee
American Jewish Congress
Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith
Central Conference of American Rabbis
National Council of Jewish Women
Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Each of these organizations is concerned with preservation of the security and constitutional rights of Jews in America through preservation of the security and constitutional rights of all Americans. They are committed to the belief that separation of church and state is the surest guarantee of religious liberty and has proved of inestimable value both to religion and to the community generally. They submit this brief because they believe that the program provided for in the statute under review is a form of aid to religious institutions, bringing in its train the evils that the constitutional guarantee of separation of church and state was designed to prevent.

In addition, these organizations, which have consistently fought for equal opportunities for all, regardless of race, color, creed or national origin, and which have always opposed racial segregation in schools, believe that grants of public funds to private schools as authorized by the Act would adversely affect the public schools and thereby stimulate the trend toward racial segregation in the schools of Pennsylvania, with private schools attended almost exclusively by white pupils and the public schools attended by most of the nonwhite children. The amici view this effect of the Act as a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Questions to Which This Brief Is Addressed

This brief amici curiae is addressed to the following questions:

1. Does the Act violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment because it does not have a valid secular purpose or effect?
2. Does the Act violate the Establishment Clause because it fosters an excessive governmental entanglement with religion?
3. Does the Act, in so far as it authorizes the payment of public funds to those private schools that are racially segregated, violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment?
4. Does the appellee Lemon have standing to raise the question as to Equal Protection?

Summary of Argument

I. The Act violates the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment because it has neither a valid secular purpose nor an effect which does not advance religion.

A. The court below accepted the legislative findings in the Act as virtually precluding inquiry into its legislative purpose. In light of clear evidence that the purpose of the Act is to keep religious schools in existence as religious institutions, such blind acceptance of the legislative findings to the contrary has the effect of nullifying the constitutional requirement that legislation assisting religious institutions have a secular legislative purpose.

B. The tuition payments provided for by the Act constitute an indirect form of governmental aid to nonpublic schools, most of which are religiously affiliated. They therefore violate the constitutional prohibition of governmental action which has the effect of advancing religion. There is no significant difference between the tuition grants involved here and direct financing of sectarian schools out of tax-raised funds.

II. The Act violates the Establishment Clause because it fosters an excessive government entanglement with religion, both administrative and political. The aid plan embodied in the present Pennsylvania law has the same potential for political divisiveness along religious lines as the plans previously stricken down by this Court. This is particularly true with respect to the danger of entanglement of religion and government in the political process.

III. In so far as the Act authorizes the payment of public funds to private schools that are racially segregated, it violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

A. There is ample evidence that the private schools which are beneficiaries of funds under the Act are racially segregated.

B. The use of public funds to maintain and perpetuate such racial segregation is prohibited. The tuition reimbursement formula embodied in the Act constitutes such an illegal use of public funds.

IV. Appellee Lemon, the father of a black child in a Pennsylvania public school, has standing to raise the question of equal protection.

ARGUMENT

POINT I

The Act violates the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment because it has neither a valid secular purpose nor a primary effect which does not advance religion.

The precise meaning of the Freedom of Religion and No-Establishment Clauses of the First Amendment, like other broad constitutional guarantees, has always been and may always be subject to dispute. Nevertheless, since this Court's now classic formulation of the reach of the Establishment Clause in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S.

1 (1947), certain tests of constitutional validity have accumulated under which particular programs must be assayed.

Chief Justice Burger stated in Lemon v. Kurtzman, Earley v. DiCenso, 403 U.S. 602, 612 (1971):

In the absence of precisely stated constitutional prohibitions, we must draw lines with reference to the three main evils against which the Establishment Clause was intended to afford protection: "sponsorship, financial support, and active involvement of the sovereign in religious activity." Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664, 668 (1970).

Three main tests, the Chief Justice continued, could be gleaned from prior cases (at 612-13):

First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion, Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 88 S. Ct. 1923, 1926, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1060, 1065 (1965); finally, the statute must not foster "an excessive government entanglement with religion." Walz, supra, at 674, 90 S. Ct. at 1414, 25 L. Ed. 2d at 704.

In Lemon-DiCenso, this Court invalidated, on the ground of excessive "entanglement," statutes in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island providing for use of state funds to pay for carefully defined secular aspects of the operations of religiously affiliated schools. The two Acts, with their elaborate provisions for state supervision to insure that the money was not used for sectarian purposes, had quite obviously been designed on the assumption that transfer of public funds to such schools, directly or indirectly, was barred by the Establishment Clause. This was true either under the oft-repeated interpretation of that Clause in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U. S. 1, 16 (1947) that "no tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions," or under the more recent statement in Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U. S. 664, 668 (1970) barring "financial support" of religious activity.

In Lemon, this Court found that the provisions in the two statutes designed to avoid the appearance of "financial support" of religious activities had created undue entanglement which rendered the statutes invalid. The present Pennsylvania statute, like others enacted since Lemon, attempted to avoid the strictures of that opinion by giving financial assistance to the schools, via parents and children, on the theory that the entanglement hurdle was the only obstacle to validation. We submit that this attempt cannot succeed. The new Pennsylvania law, by limiting administrative entanglement, has provided for the simple, though indirect, transfer of state funds to religiously affiliated schools, with no restraints on their being used for religious purposes. Such a transfer must necessarily have both a religious purpose and a religious effect and must therefore violate two of the tests laid down in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U. S. 203 (1963) and reaffirmed in Walz and Lemon-DiCenso, supra.

In a number of recent lower court decisions, it has been pointed out that there is no way around the dilemma created by the purpose and effect and the entanglement tests since the less the state attempts to restrict and control public funds to escape the entanglement prong, the greater the likelihood that the state supplied funds will be used for religious as well as secular purposes. See, e.g., Wolman v. Essex, 342 F. Supp. 399, 414 (S.D. Ohio 1972), aff'd, mem. 93 S. Ct. 61 (1972); Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Oakey, 339 F. Supp. 545, 549-50 (D. Vt. 1972).

There is nothing surprising about this. It is merely a reflection of the fact, taken for granted until quite recently, that the Constitution bars government from resorting to any device to use its resources to finance religious institutions.

A. The Sectarian Purpose

In the case at bar, the court below concluded that the Act expressed a "legitimate secular objective consistent with the Establishment Clause," basing its conclusion upon the stated legislative purpose of the Act: to aid parents to continue to send their children to nonpublic schools, thereby fostering educational opportunities for both public and nonpublic schools. Lemon v. Sloan, et al., 340 F. Supp. 1356, 1360 (E.D. Pa., 1972). The court also took note of legislative findings expressed by the General Assembly and its declaration of policy that present standards of public education would be seriously jeopardized if parents of nonpublic school children could no longer afford tuition costs and were forced to send their children to public schools. The court then accorded this stated legislative intent "appropriate deference" and declared that the Act passed the first test of a "secular purpose."

We note also that this Court in Lemon v. Kurtzman, supra, accorded similar deference to the stated legislative intent of the Acts there considered, although they were nevertheless invalidated on other grounds. In discussing the secular legislative purpose test, the court said it had no reason to believe that the Pennsylvania and Rhode Island Legislatures meant anything other than they said, and that nothing before the Court undermined those stated legislative intents (403 U.S. at 613).

We submit, nevertheless, that, notwithstanding traditional deference to the legislatures, it would be naive to unquestionably accept as the purpose of any Act whatever language the draftsmen put in the preamble. To decline even to consider piercing the veil of a state's legislative intent is to permit subversion of the Constitution through the recitation of a formula preamble or statement of purpose.

It can hardly be denied that the Pennsylvania Legislature, in enacting the Pennsylvania Reimbursement Act for Nonpublic Education, was concerned not with standards of public education, but with the continued existence of the parochial schools of that state. We have been repeatedly told that parochial schools everywhere are in financial difficulties. We know that legislation has been enacted in numerous states for the very purpose of preserving these schools. It should not be necessary to review the impassioned pleas of parents and school officials, particularly as reported in the press, urging that aid be given so that church-related schools may remain financially viable. The plea is for the church-related schools, which are felt by those pressing for government aid to be the cornerstone of their church's mission. If the public schools are mentioned at all in these pleas, it is only in warnings that, if public aid is not forthcoming, the public schools will be inundated by students from private institutions forced to close their doors. This threat, we submit, is speculative. Its validity has not yet been demonstrated in any state.

We submit that the court below erroneously passed over the question whether the Act does indeed have a secular purpose. More broadly, we suggest that this Court spell out more clearly the meaning of the "secular purpose" test, lest it become deadletter. The lower courts appear to be treating it as such.

Thus, in Wolman v. Essex, supra, a three-judge court held (342 F. Supp. at 411) that Ohio's Parental Reimbursement statute satisfied the secular purpose test because nonpublic schools perform in substantial part a strictly secular function. The state was also said to have a legitimate concern in requiring minimum standards in all of its schools and the Ohio statute was passed with the express purpose of helping nonpublic schools maintain these standards. The court then commented, in footnote 13 (at 411), that, in its opinion, "the first prong of the Lemon test will almost invariably be satisfied in cases of this type and may not truly exist as a distinct, dispositive requirement."

Similarly, in Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty (PEARL) v. Nyquist, 350 F. Supp. 655, 660 (S.D.N.Y. 1972), probable jurisdiction noted, 93 S. Ct. 962 (1972), District Judge Gurfein, writing for the majority, stated: "In sum, we do not go behind the statements of the New York Legislature, although it is manifest that, regardless of the variety of secular arguments advanced to support the legislation, the prime legislative concern is to see that religious parochial schools do not go under for lack of financial support." (Emphasis added.)

We submit that the "purpose" test laid down by this Court should not be treated so cavalierly and that, where a "prime legislative concern" to preserve religious schools through the use of government resources is clear, it should not be ignored merely on the basis of pro forma recitations in legislative findings. Moreover, while a state surely has a legitimate concern in requiring minimum standards in all schools, it is not the business of the state, we submit, to provide public funds to enable schools established for religious purposes to maintain such standards. To allow the state to do this would deprive the "secular purpose" test of meaning.

B. The Sectarian Effect

The court below struck down the Act under the second prong of the Lemon test. It concluded that the effect of the Act was to aid religious schools and that the failure of the state to insure that funds were restricted to secular education or general welfare services rendered the Act unconstitutional (at 1364). It observed that the legislative findings and declaration of policy acknowledged that this type of aid would have the effect of enabling nonpublic schools, including church-related schools, to continue to operate (at 1363), even though it failed to hold that this was the purpose of the Act.

Nevertheless, the language of the opinion below lends credibility and support to our argument above concerning purpose. In the portion of its opinion considering the effect of the Act (at 1364), the court stated:

If parents cannot afford to pay the tuition, they must take their child out of the nonpublic schools and if enough parents are unable to pay these costs, the schools will be forced to close. It was precisely this possibility that led the Pennsylvania General Assembly to pass the Act under review. By providing parents with additional funds because they have paid tuition at nonpublic schools, the Commonwealth is trying to insure the continued ability of the parents to afford tuition costs and therefore the continued existence of nonpublic schools, including sectarian schools.

Be that as it may, the opinion below concluded, first, that sectarian schools would be aided by state funds under the Act and, second, that the Act also unconstitutionally supported religion because it aided parents in providing a religious education for their children. We submit that both of these analyses are correct.

It is beyond dispute that tuition reimbursement will facilitate and promote the enrollment of children at church-related schools, schools which constitute an integral part of the religious mission of the sponsoring churches. It was argued below by appellants that, in the absence of earmarking, one could not ascertain that payments under the Act would encourage such enrollment. The lower court quite rightly rejected that contention, saying (at 1364):

It is clear that a possible and quite likely use of the aid under review is to enable parents to continue to pay tuition at sectarian schools. Tuition payments support both religious and secular education at these schools. The mere fact that the Act does not require that parents use the funds to pay tuition at church-related schools does not relieve the state of its duty to preclude the use of its funds to support religious activities.

This statement was bottomed on the conclusion of this Court in Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672, 682-84 (1971), that a government aid program can be invalidated on the basis of a significant risk that the aid may serve to support religious activity at some future time.

Wolman v. Essex, supra, which should be dispositive of the instant case, declared (342 F. Supp at 416) that:

The state cannot claim it does not know what the parents will do with their grants, for the expressed intent of the statute is to "reimburse parents of nonpublic school children for a portion of the financial burden experienced by them" in sending their children to parochial schools. It does not matter that the parents are subsequently free to use the money received for any purpose. The intent of the statute in providing the reimbursement must speak for itself. (Citations omitted.)

The Wolman opinion noted that, during the 1970-71 school year, 98% of the students attending nonpublic schools in Ohio attended denominational schools and that approximately 95% attended Catholic schools. Similarly, the Report of the New York State Commission on the Quality and Financing of Elementary and Secondary Education disclosed that 93% of private school students attend religious schools. In Pennsylvania, 96.6% of private school pupils attend church-affiliated schools.¹ It is a matter of public cognizance that of students attending church-affiliated schools, in state after state, one organized religious group is the predominant beneficiary of all parochial legislation. (See also Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Paire, 348 F. Supp. 506, 509-10 (D.N.H. 1972)).

The lower court in Wolman, which invalidated Ohio's tuition reimbursement statute, thought that the second prong of the Lemon test, the principal or primary effect of the statute, was really a restatement of the neutrality test, first discussed in Everson, supra, and later reformulated in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963). "One method of gauging neutrality, in terms of the Religion Clauses," said the Wolman opinion, "is to observe the class to which it is directed and that will be affected by it." Although the court did not base its holding entirely upon the second prong of the Lemon test, it observed that (at 412):

In all the cases in which the Court has upheld legislation attacked on Establishment Clause grounds, the affected class has been substantially broader than the class affected by the Ohio statute. * * * In each of these cases religiously affiliated institutions were among a broad class of beneficiaries deriving benefits of a general, broad-based, public policy. These cases are truly analogous to situations in which the state provides police and fire protection generally to all people and property, within its jurisdiction, regardless of religious affiliation.

Thus, the breadth of the class to be benefited is of overriding importance.

In the case at bar, the lower court took care to stress that it could perceive no constitutional difference in whether payments were made directly to the church-related school, indirectly using parents as a conduit, or in the form of reimbursement to parents with dollars that need not necessarily be used at the educational institution. For, said the court with careful logic (at 1365):

The economic consequences are the same for the church-related school whether it receives funds through a direct grant, a conduit plan or because the state increases family incomes through a reimbursement program which enables the parents to continue to pay tuition. In each case, tax-raised funds are being used to subsidize religious education.

There is ample precedent for this reasoning. In fact, state courts have invariably invalidated tuition grant plans in which public funds were to be paid to parents. See Almond v. Day, 197 Va. 419, 89 S.E. 2d 851 (1955); Hartness v. Patterson, 179 S.E. 2d 907 (S. Carolina 1971); Swart v. South Burlington School District, 122 Vt. 177, 167 A. 2d 514, cert. den. 366 U.S. 925 (1961); Opinion of the Justices, 259 N.E. 2d 564 (Mass. Sup. Jud. Ct., 1970). Similarly, the three-judge court in Wolman, supra, whose holding was affirmed by an 8 to 1 vote of this Court, stated (342 F. Supp. at 415):

Payment to the parent for transmittal to the denominational school does not have a cleansing effect and somehow cause the funds to lose their identity as public funds. While the ingenuity of man is apparently limitless, the Court had held with unvarying regularity that one may not do by indirection what is forbidden directly; one may not by form alone contradict the substance.

(The Wolman opinion then went on to recall that a variant of the indirection principle was attempted in certain Southern states where monetary grants were made to parents or students for use at so-called "private schools." These attempts to avoid the constitutional obligation to desegregate the public schools of these states were uniformly disallowed. See, e.g., Griffin v. School Board of Prince Edward County, 377 U.S. 218 (1964); Lee v. Macon County Board, 267 F. Supp. 458 (1967), aff'd sub nom. Wallace v. United States, 389 U.S. 215 (1967); Poindexter v. Louisiana Financial Assistance Commission, 296 F. Supp. 686 (1968), aff'd 393 U.S. 17 (1968). Although these decisions rejecting tuition grants arose under the Equal Protection Clause, rather than the Establishment Clause or its state equivalents, the principle is analogous. As Justice Douglas noted in Abington, supra, 374 U.S. at 230, "[I]t is the use to which public funds are put and not to whom they are provided that is controlling.")

The Wolman opinion concluded (342 F. Supp. at 417) that, "Since the potential ultimate effect of the scheme is to aid religious enterprises, the Establishment Clause forbids its implementation regardless of the form adopted in the statute for achieving that purpose." That is precisely the point we wish to emphasize.

It is clear from Lemon-DiCenso that payments of public funds may not be made directly to religious schools, and no one would now argue the constitutional validity of direct money grants to such institutions. Nevertheless, it is argued that the strictures of Lemon-DiCenso may be avoided either if sums are paid to parents functioning as conduits or channels to the religious schools, or if sums are paid to parents in reimbursement for tuition paid without any requirement that they actually be used for payment of tuition.

We submit, however, that Wolman stands for the common-sense proposition that it is irrelevant what method the state uses to advance religious enterprises, when the economic consequences are the same for all concerned. This point was also made by Judge Hays in PEARL v. Nyquist, supra, dissenting opinion, at 675, when he said:

There is no essential difference between a parent's receiving a $50 reimbursement for tuition paid to a parochial school and his receiving a $50 benefit because he sends his child to a parochial school. In both instances the money involved represents a charge made upon the state for the purpose of religious education. [Emphasis in original.]

It is also important to remark upon the unanimous holding of the three-judge Federal District Court in Ohio which had before it a tax credit plan for nonpublic school parents following Wolman's invalidation of the parental reimbursement statute. In the Ohio tax credit case, entitled Kosydar v. Wolman, Civil Action No. 72-212 and Wolman v. Kosydar, Civil Action No. 72-222, the court reaffirmed the Wolman holding that direct monetary grants to the parents of nonpublic school children violate the First Amendment, and then proceeded to a consideration of whether the state may nevertheless, through its taxing machinery, confer benefits by way of tax credits upon a class of persons composed of nonpublic school parents and an additional minor segment of the public school population. (In response to language in the Wolman opinion, an attempt was made to broaden the class of recipients for aid under the new tax credit legislation. These recipients included persons enrolled in home instruction programs, in public adult high school continuation programs and in schools for tubercular persons; persons enrolled in vocational and basic literacy programs; persons paying non-resident public school tuition payments; and students enrolled in public or private programs for the deaf, blind, crippled, emotionally disturbed, neurologically handicapped or mentally retarded. However, the benefited class, as the court noted, was nonetheless of a predominantly sectarian character.) Again, for the reasons outlined in Wolman, the court held the tax credit statute unconstitutional.

Said the court (at 25, Slip Opinion):

It simply defies reason to say that such a statute does not aid sectarian schools. Such aid may be less direct and less capable of precise measurement than a grant to the schools themselves; yet, if some parents will now be able to send their children to these schools or if fewer parents already utilizing them will be forced to withdraw their children, they will be aided.

* * *

We hold that where, as here, the recipient of state conferred benefits is a predominantly sectarian class of schools and therefore as a matter of law the primary effect of such benefits is to advance religion, then the form of these benefits, whether by tax credits, exemptions or deduction, cannot alone insulate them from First Amendment infirmity. * * * The exaltation of form over substance no longer has any place in our jurisdiction. POINT II

The Act violates the Establishment Clause because it fosters an excessive governmental entanglement with religion, both administrative and political.

In Lemon-DiCenso, supra, this Court invalidated Pennsylvania and Rhode Island Acts because the "cumulative impact of the entire relationship arising under the statutes in each State involves excessive entanglement between government and religion" (at 614). Having so concluded, this Court found it unnecessary to decide whether legislative precautions under each Act restricted the primary effect of the programs to the point where they did not offend the Religion Clauses.

Entanglement was found in Lemon in part, but only in part, because of the close government supervision of church schools required by the Pennsylvania and Rhode Island statutes. Equally important were other considerations which apply with equal force here. Thus, this Court referred not only to the administrative entanglement aspect but also to entanglement of religion and government in the political process. It said (at 622-3):

* * * In a community where such a large number of pupils are served by church-related schools, it can be assumed that state assistance will entail considerable political activity. Partisans of parochial schools, understandably concerned with rising costs and sincerely dedicated to both the religious and secular educational missions of their schools, will inevitably champion this cause and promote political action to achieve their goals. Those who oppose state aid, whether for constitutional, religious, or fiscal reasons, will inevitably respond and employ all of the usual political campaign techniques to prevail. Candidates will be forced to declare and voters to choose. It would be unrealistic to ignore the fact that many people confronted with issues of this kind will find their votes aligned with their faith.

Ordinarily political debate and division, however vigorous or even partisan, are normal and healthy manifestations of our democratic system of government, but political division along religious lines was one of the principal evils against which the First Amendment was intended to protect. Freund, Comment, Public Aid to Parochial Schools, 82 Harv. L. Rev. 1680, 1692 (1969). The potential divisiveness of such conflict is a threat to the normal political process. Walz v. Tax Commission, supra, at 695, 90 S. Ct., at 1424 (separate opinion of Harlan, J.). See also Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S., at 249, 88 S. Ct., at 1929 (Harlan, J., concurring); Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 307, 83 S. Ct. 1560, 1616, 10 L. Ed. 2d 844 (1963) (Goldberg, J., concurring). To have States or communities divide on the issues presented by state aid to parochial schools would tend to confuse and obscure other issues of great urgency. * * *

The present Pennsylvania plan for aiding sectarian schools is just as productive of "political division along religious lines" as the one condemned in Lemon. Whatever form government aid to church schools may take—salary supplement plans as in DiCenso, tuition reimbursement as in this case, or tax credits as in other cases now before this Court—the level and even the existence of the state support will be a public issue at every election and during each legislative session. This can be prevented only if it is made clear that the Constitution bars all forms of government aid to religiously affiliated schools.

Certainly, there is no reason to believe that enactment of any one bill will eliminate the issue from the public sphere. There will always be pressure to raise or to lower the amount of the reimbursement allowance, the tax credit or whatever form of allotment may be devised.

This has already been illustrated in Pennsylvania. In 1971, the state legislature provided that 23% of the revenues collected under the Pennsylvania Cigarette Tax Act should be paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the Parent Reimbursement Fund beginning in July 1971. The 1972 legislature amended the Act to provide that 10% of such revenues collected be paid into the Parent Reimbursement Fund. However, the original bill introduced that year (H.B. 2150) proposed that 5% of the revenues collected be credited to the the Reimbursement Fund. Obviously, neither 23%, 10% nor 5% is a fixed, immutable figure. It is conceivable, even likely, that upward revisions will be necessitated by inflationary pressures. But even without inflation advocates of state aid are bound to seek constant raising of the level of aid until they reach their candidly stated goal of "parity," under which the state would spend the same amount for secular education of each child in non-public schools as it spends on each public school child. Surely, as this Court pointed out in Lemon-DiCenso, these are the very evils the First Amendment sought to avoid.

POINT III

Insofar as the Act authorizes the payment of public funds to private schools that are racially segregated, it violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

A. The private schools which are beneficiaries of funds under the Act are racially segregated.

The allegations contained in the complaint, which must be taken as true in this phase of the case, include the following in paragraph 11:

The Act on its face and as construed and applied by the defendant authorizes and directs payments for the tuition of students in educational institutions which by purpose or effect segregate students by race, thereby perpetuating and promoting the segregation of races and two separate school systems in Pennsylvania—a public school system predominantly black, poor and inferior and a private subsidized school system predominantly white, affluent and superior.

There is ample reason for believing that these allegations can be substantiated on trial. Available evidence shows that the non-church-related schools in Pennsylvania and the non-Catholic church-related schools were all virtually 100-per-cent white. The Catholic parochial school system, while it contains a substantial proportion of black students, is nevertheless largely segregated.

The periodical, Commonweal, in its October 7, 1966 issue, quoted the following statement of Richardson Dil-worth, former Mayor and former School Board President in Philadelphia (p. 13):

Today, in our city, 40 per cent of the total school population is in parochial and private schools. The result is that while only 30 per cent of our city's population is non-white, 57 per cent of our public school pupils are non-white. And, today, there are more white children in parochial and private schools than there are in our city's entire public school system.

The following facts are set forth in the 1967 Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights entitled "Racial Isolation in the Public Schools" (p. 31):

Private and parochial school enrollment, which is overwhelmingly white, also is a significant factor in the increasing separation of white and Negro school children.

* * *

In 1960, of the more than four million pupils enrolled in non-public elementary schools in the United States, only 140,529 were non-white. 44,308 non-whites were attending non-public secondary schools which had a total enrollment of more than one million.

The Report says further (pp. 38-39):

Private and parochial school enrollment also is an important factor in the increasing concentration of Negroes in city school systems. Non-public school enrollment constitutes a major segment of the nation's elementary and secondary school population. Nationally, about one-sixth of the total 1960 school enrollment (Grades 1-12) was in private schools. In metropolitan areas the proportion is slightly higher, and divided unevenly between city and suburb. Nearly one-third more elementary school students in the cities attend nonpublic schools than in the suburbs. Almost all of them are white. In the larger metropolitan areas the trend is even more pronounced. * * * [A] much higher proportion of white city students than white suburban students attend private and parochial elementary schools. Nonwhites in these metropolitan areas, whether in cities or suburbs, attend public schools almost exclusively.

A table, following this statement, shows the following proportion of total elementary students, by race, in public and nonpublic schools, for 15 metropolitan areas in 1960 (p. 39):

Central Cities	White	Nonwhite
Public Schools	61%	94%
Nonpublic Schools	39%	6%
Suburbs	White	Nonwhite
Public Schools	75%	97%
Nonpublic Schools	25%	3%

Since the issuance of the Civil Rights Commission Report more recent figures for Philadelphia have become available.

In the city of Philadelphia proper in January 1971, 63.6% of the total enrollment in public schools was nonwhite (including Spanish-speaking). This contrasts sharply with the situation in the Catholic parochial schools in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia which includes four adjacent counties. There, in September 1971, only 8.4% of the elementary students and 5.1% of the secondary students were nonwhite (including Spanish-speaking).²

2. Excluded from these figures is the relatively small number of non-Catholics attending Catholic parochial schools, because their racial breakdown is not given. (Non-Catholic pupils comprised 2.1% and .3% respectively, of the pupils attending Catholic elementary and secondary schools).

These figures are derived from "Enrollment: Negro and Spanish Speaking in the Philadelphia Public Schools—1970-71" by the Office of Research and Evaluation of the School District of Philadelphia and from "The Report of the Archdiocesan Advisory Committee on the Financial Crisis of Catholic Schools in Philadelphia and Surrounding Counties" by John T. Gurash, Chairman of the Committee, 1972.

The foregoing figures illustrate, as to both Pennsylvania and the United States generally, that enrollment of black children in private schools is very low and far below the ratio of blacks in the total population.

The result, of course, is that the percentage of white children in public schools is considerably lower than it should be on the basis of the white-black ratio in the population. Many public schools, even in racially mixed neighborhoods, are becoming Negro schools because of the movement of white children to private schools. This leads, in effect, to a dual system of schools—the public schools attended predominantly by blacks and the private schools, mainly parochial schools, attended predominantly by whites.

B. The use of public funds to maintain and perpetuate racial segregation is prohibited.

In Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), this Court declared racial segregation in public education to be a denial of the equal protection guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. It held unconstitutional the dual system under which whites and Negroes were required to attend different schools in a number of Southern states.
